Memorial Day weekend marks the start of the busy summer travel season, but this year it represents the end of one of the worst chapters in airline history.

Airlines see demand rise as summer season begins

By Niraj Chokshi

NEW YORK TIMES

Memorial Day weekend typically marks the start of the busy summer travel season, but this year it represents something more: the end of one of the worst chapters in airline history.

Return to the skies

After losing billions of dollars during the pandemic, airlines expect strong demand over the next few months as Americans embrace a return to normalcy. The number of Americans flying for fun or to visit friends and family has almost completely recovered, airlines say.

The Transportation Security Administration reported that it screened nearly 2 million people Friday at airports, ahead of the Memorial Day weekend. That's the most since the COVID-19 pandemic started in March, signaling a rebound of travel as people take advantage of relaxed restrictions and expanding vaccinations.

Fares have nearly climbed back to pre-pandemic levels, and travelers are booking flights months ahead, especially leisure travelers, giving airlines the confidence to schedule more flights. The Transportation Security Administration plans to hire about 1,000 employees by July 4.

Masks remain

But some parts of the travel experience are still different. Masks are still required in airports and on airplanes through at least mid-September. According to flight schedules, only a few states, mostly with beaches or mountains, are expected to see more flights in July than in the same month in 2019.

Shortages, long lines Finding a rental car will

Finding a rental car likely will be tougher as some in the industry sold off part of their fleets to survive.

be harder than it was before the pandemic. That's because the rental industry sold off some of its fleet to survive. Lines and waits may be longer as airports, airlines, hotels and other travel businesses struggle to manage more travelers with fewer employees. Despite the optimism, airlines still have a long recovery ahead.

Two big moneymakers corporate and international travel – remain depressed. With businesses embracing remote work and the virus still prevalent in some countries, no one knows how soon such travel will rebound.

Vacation comeback

The U.S. will have a busy vacation season this summer as cities make a strong comeback, according to Stephen Kaufer, chief executive officer of TripAdvisor

"Now we have a lot more activities all around the country, and it's not just outdoors. The cities are making a very real comeback," Kaufer said on CBS' "Face the Nation" on Sunday. Hotel searches on TripAdvisor have gone up and bookings of experiences are going strong, he said, adding that people also plan to take longer vacations and spend more money on their trips.

International travel is still lagging behind, and the U.S. State Department's "Do Not Travel" advisories for most countries have affected the business "massively," Kaufer said.

"They are still not going internationally as much as they might have been in 2019. They're just not sure yet how much is open, especially in Europe. But we expect that to increase over the course of the summer," he said.

Kaufer urges travelers to be patient with waiting times at airports and fully packed flights. American Airlines Group Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co. both postponed plans to resume serving alcohol on flights amid a surge of inflight violence.

Barriers to travel

Passenger volumes are unlikely to return to prepandemic levels until at least 2023, according to Airlines for America, a trade group. Air travel is also limited by the speed with which cities and attractions reopen.

"The constraint is being able to get a hotel, or a rental car, or things like that," Vasu Raja, the chief revenue officer at American Airlines, said recently.

But those barriers are falling. The European Union is opening its borders to vaccinated tourists. In the United States, cities, states and popular tourist attractions like Walt Disney World are rolling back pandemic restrictions.

"We aren't through the end of the tunnel yet, but we clearly see the light at the end of the tunnel," said Scott Kirby, the chief executive of United Airlines.

Big commodities cycle over? Hedge funds cool their bets By Michael Hirtzer sum, the much-vaunted net-long stakes in natural commodity supercycle is in and Yvonne Yue Li

The debate in commodity markets over whether this year's supercharged rally is over, or whether prices will move higher after a pause, is in full swing. For now, hedge funds have stepped to the side.

Commodity investors are reducing bets on further price gains in everything from crops to copper to natural gas. Hedge-fund holdings this week in 20 of commodities tracked in the Bloomberg Commodity Index fell by the most since November. according to data from the U.S. Commodity Futures Trading Commission and Weather is boosting U.S. crops, pointing to bigger harvests, while also reducing demand for natural gas. Oil markets are bracing for bigger supplies and China, the biggest commodities buyer, is moving to contain high raw material prices. In doubt as bearish factors emerge amid inflation fears and demand concerns.

The rallies may not be over but new peaks will likely depend on supply and demand rather than speculative buying across raw materials. "We're back to more normal fundamentals, not outside distorted fundamentals," Don Roose, president of brokerage U.S. Commodities in West Des Moines, Iowa, said Friday.

Blasts of rainfall in parts of the U.S. crop belt are expected to increase yield prospects for corn and soybeans.

The bigger harvests would help replenish depleted global stockpiles. Net-bullish bets for Chicago corn slumped for the sixth straight week to the lowest since December while those for soybean meal were cut in half, the regulatory data showed.

energy markets, hedge funds have slashed gas by 7 percent to the lowest in six weeks as mild U.S. weather conditions dampen demand. Bullish oil positions are at the lowest in about five months as the market braces for potentially more supply coming from major producing countries, including

Net-long copper bets on the Comex in New York are at the lowest in more than 10 months as Beijing makes moves to contain surging raw material prices, including a "zero tolerance" policy for hoarding the metal.

There are a few outliers. Funds are showing more appetite for arabica coffee, the type favored by Starbucks Corp., and net-bullish positions are at the highest since November 2016 as drought continues to be a concern for top shipper

Investors are also being lured back to gold as an inflation hedge, increasing net-long bets to the highest level in 20 weeks.
